Dear Sir/Madam

With the current discussion and concern about the environment, I am surprised to learn that the government is proposing to interfere in the running of environmental charities, requiring them to spend 50% of funds on remediation.

I would have thought preventing damage by advocacy is better than subsequent remediation. Hampering the way these charities spend their donations would result in a poorer environment and that is something that concerns me.

Each charity should be allowed to set its own priorities.

Regards
